Journal of Cell Science is devoted to all aspects of the study of cells. The scope of the journal is wide, and papers dealing with the entire range of investigations of cell organization, including accounts of advances in the relevant techniques, will be acceptable. Thus, in addition to studies of the structure and functions of plant and animal cells and their extracellular products (for example, cell walls, cuticles), papers will be published on such topics as cell growth and division, cell movements and interactions, and cell genetics. Contributions concerned with aspects of morphogenesis at the cellular and subcellular levels will also be acceptable. Studies of the organization of micro-organisms will be welcomed, as will papers dealing with the study of viruses, in so far as they are relevant to an understanding of cell organization (for example, those dealing with cell/virus interactions). Cytochemical papers will be acceptable, but histochemical work, in which the emphasis is on the localization of substances at the tissue level, will not ordinarily be included. Occasional review articles will be published.
